Women Still Make Less Money

The Women's Rights Association released statistical data last week that revealed that women still earn less than men. While there are an equal number of women at the workplace, women typically make a lower salary than men in the same line of work. The data show that most women only make three-quarters of the wages that men make. African-American women and Hispanic women reportedly make even less than that, and older women were at the bottom as they are making only half of what the men take in. The association is hoping that employers will turn around this kind of discriminatory pay practice and treat women fairly when it comes to wages.
